House of Lords reform

| 2016 | House of Lords reform | In recent weeks, the vocal issue of Lords reform has appeared once again on the political agenda. In particular, the size of the House of Lords has come under scrutiny. At a time when MPs are looking to reduce the size of the House of Commons from 650 seats to about 600, there are 861 peers in the upper house. In September, the Campaign for an Effective Second Chamber (CESC), co-chaired by Lord Cormack and Lord Norton, suggested a series of proposals to reduce the size of the House of Lords. One suggestion is that peers with a less than 20% attendance rate should lose their office. The composition and powers of the Lords have also been thrown into the spotlight by the Brexit vote and the court ruling on Article 50. Currently Labour and Liberal Democrat peers in the Lords can outvote the government, and it has been suggested that they could derail Brexit. Meanwhile, Lord Strathclyde’s (Conservative) proposal to curtail the power of the Lords has been put on hold by the government. More information:

Senate developments in the 2016 US General Election

<tr>
<td>2016</td>
<td>The Watergate report</td>
<td>While most attention revolved around the role of the UN in 2016, an equally important story was emerging in the drive to control the US Senate. Going into the elections, many observers were optimistic that they might be able to wrest control of the upper chamber from the Republicans, a prospect made more plausible with more Republicans than Democrats up for re-election after their strong showing in the 2014 mid-term, in the event, Republicans managed to hold on to control of the Senate, aided by a reduced majority, leading to much frantic media speculation about what unified Republic control of the presidency and both chambers of Congress might bring. Important aspects of president elect Trump’s agenda could be enabled or delayed by the Senate, so this will be a fascinating relationship to watch in the next few months.</td>
